The control of the motor is effected by means of push buttons, a pilot switch, a float switch or a pressure regulator (or governor). With motors having wound rotors the current limiting relays may be connected either in stator or rotor circuit, but with motors having squirrel cage rotors the relay must be connected in the stator circuit. Motors having squirrel-cage rotors are started with reduced voltage, which is obtained either by series resistance or from an auto transformer. Two contactors are necessary: one connects the motor to the starting rheostat (or auto-transformer) and the other, which is controlled by the current-limiting relay, connects the motor directly to the line. Only one starting point is required because, with normal designs of motors, any voltage which will start the motor will accelerate it to nearly synchronous speed. The method in which an autotransformer is used is preferable to that in which a rheostat is used since, for equal starting torques, the line current will be lower. The voltage impressed on motor at starting should be such that the starting operation occupies from 4 to 8 seconds. If the starting period is much less than 4 seconds a lower voltage can be used: while, if the period is greater than 8 seconds, a higher voltage is necessary. Motors having wound rotors are started by inserting resistances in the rotor circuit, the sections being cut out by contactors controlled by current-limiting relays. The number of...
