What a fine slate and what a proper time is this for talking of the excesses of ministers, of the injury of the constitution, of the vices of the age, of the wise and sober measures to be adopted, . . . and of the general necessity for retrenchment and reform. Full of the subject, and of the liquor imbibed, and pleased with the liberty of the press, this free-thinking patriot returns home, persuaded, that John Bull will swallow all his rhetoric. He then examines his cellar with partial eye also, and doubles his political views by an additional bottle; thus drowning his own cares and those of the people at the same time. . . . What a rare conductor of the judgement of the people! what a clear and perspicuous foresight he must have! how implicitly may the nation depend on his support!--Rather ought we not to say that this is indeed--the blind leading the blind. CAPTAIN C. A gay young reprobate from twenty to twenty-five, is now no longer dangerous; nor does the blaze of houses and of equipages, or of splendid presents and a profusion of gold, dazzle the eyes or seduce the mind of the soft and sentimental erring fair. These butterflies only buzz about the middle-aged declining dames, or purchase hearts by the weight of gold or gems. These army, rattles, or unfledged collegebirds, are very much avoided and dreaded by the cautious, but not less amorous frail one. Their...
